Irene never thought that she would end up in a wave of tragic events. She did not foresee it ever turning out like it has right now. The school has been

...and no one is ever turning out as tall, thin, or...the nation has become... a second home for her; while the other students she prefers to spend her free time at school, just reading books in the school library. However one day, all the fictional stories that she had read, began to feel more real everyday. They would creep their way into her dreams like a nightmare. The first, second and third dreadful nights, with unexplainable dreams and confusion left him/her with little clarity.

But as the days went by, they began to get clearer. A feeling of familiarity and quiet began to settle within her mind. This is where she began to realise that her submissions activates were interconnected and with each night, they would simply continue where the other dream left off. A dream where's a gift like her, that originally was a lonely looking girl, with no obvious attractiveness, would transform into a beautiful royal princess complete with grand confidants and all; princesses who seemed ready to fight anyone who opposed her, and like one of the old fantasy books which she read in the literary previous weeks prior to the dreams. It might sound a little exhilarating, but unfortunately, she also couldn't escape the fact that the dream she had, hadn't only taken one reference book.

The dreams would besiege all genres of her world—fantasy and mystery alike. Taking her father and further down a rabbit hole of dreams—perhaps mishaps of dreams that would soon free her and free her out. Her mind and dreams were now occupied with the thoughts and stories of the many books she loved. She would inevitably have to deal with the reality that, the magical worlds would continue to nose out, even on dreams. They would forever spin in her mind. But how will she live? How will Iren survive? How can the marriage escape from the realm of dreams?
